

To The Committee On Standards In Public Life

I would like to propose that a fair and effective way of reversing the anger against MPs, and providing them with necessary accommodation in London in order for them to carry out their parliamentary business, would be to allocate for their use (along with their families if they wish) homes within the poorest and most downtrodden neighbourhoods of London. By sharing the living conditions of the poorest, they would gain both credibility, and a more realistic insight into the problems of the nation they serve. Too their presence in the communities might directly inject needed energy and direction.
